BITING COMMENTARY

Pet owners may be liable for injuries caused by their pets if they knew (or should have known) that the animal was likely to cause the type of injury that occurred. Thus, a person who has been injured by an animal may base his or her claim of liability on the animal's past behavior as a means of providing evidence that the owner should have known of the danger presented by his or her pet. On the other hand, if it can be shown that the animal possessed some inborn predisposition toward aggressive behavior, the party injured by the animal may be able to recover compensation without proving any prior incidents of biting.

We have a strong commitment to our clients and we provide them with efficient and professional legal services. Our goal is to make your legal matters less stressful while achieving the best outcome for your case. When you have a pressing legal matter at hand, call to schedule a free initial consultation. We concentrate on personal injury cases and for your convenience, we offer hospital and in home visits.

HINT: Pet owners are usually covered by their homeowners or renter's insurance for injuries caused by their pets.
